Subject: Save Napoleon's House on St Helena

Dear Sir/Madam,

Though the French domains on St Helena may be extremely isolated and lost in the middle of the South Atlantic, they have not been forgotten. For more than one hundred and fifty years now, France has maintained its presence on the island in commemoration of Napoleon's infamous exile there. Indeed, the preservation of that remembrance of Napoleon's last years was not easy: even when Napoleon lived there the house was nothing special, and the subsequent measures taken to preserve it were not viewed in the long-term. However, the world was to catch hold of the Napoleonic legend and perpetuate a vision of the emperor which would brave the winds and the waves and carry the remembrance of the emperor to its four corners.

The French Ministry of Foreign and European Affairs has entrusted me with the task of preserving these domains. It provides me with the means to see to the upkeep of the building, its grounds and its woods on a daily basis. Ever since the death of the Napoleon, the emperor's "House at Longwood" has had a chequered history, passing from residence to stable before finally ending up a realm of memory visited by thousands each year; and there are those for whom the island of St Helena itself is synonymous with Napoleon.

The history of the house is very much at a turning point, and it is up to us to preserve the building for future generations, so as to anchor Longwood further in its place within world heritage. We must seize this opportunity. In the planning stages of this project, every possible scenario has been envisaged, from demolition (only a hypothesis, I must add!) to varying degrees of restoration. My choice has come down to preservation and consolidation taking closely into account respect for the house's environment and restorational logic. In this I have been solidly backed by the Fondation Napoléon, an institution which for the past ten years has generously supported research into, and restoration of, the house fabric. The French Ministry of Foreign Affairs is well aware of the exceptional historical importance of the French domains on St Helena and entirely shares our enthusiasm for the restoration project. As a result of this common accord, a long-term preservation scheme has been drawn up by Michel Jantzen, head architect for the French government's institution for historical monuments.

Longwood House is pregnant with the history, and that history is the world's heritage. Its future is in your hands. By taking part in this restoration project, you will be helping to write a beautiful page in the history of world heritage.

Please give generously,

French domains on St Helena

The French estates on St Helena comprise three separate sites: Longwood House, the Valley of the Tomb (where Napoleon's mortal remains lay buried between 1821 and 1840) and the Briars pavilion (where Napoleon stayed during the first few weeks of his captivity). Longwood and the Valley of the Tomb were purchased by Napoleon III in 1858, and the Briars pavilion was donated to France in 1970 by descendants of the Balcombe family.

The properties are managed by the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The day-to-day management of the sites and the collections on display is supervised by Michel Dancoisne-Martineau, honorary consul and curator of the properties. Despite the island's geographical isolation, the properties receive on average 15,000 visitors per year.

Longwood House

Napoleon I's residence between December 1815 and his death on the 5th May, 1821 is situated on the Longwood plain, one of the most exposed and weather-beaten areas on St Helena.

The residence is divided into three principal adjoining parts: to the north are Napoleon's apartments, where the French emperor lived and died; at the heart of the building are the servants' quarters, which give out onto a small interior courtyard; and to the south is the block known as the "Generals Wing", where Generals Gourgaud and Montholon, Dr O'Meara, Las Cases and the British orderly stayed during Napoleon's exile.

A section of the servants' quarters and the Generals Wing is given over to the precious collection of prints, furniture and objects dating from the period, which has been painstakingly assembled over the years by successive curators.

The need for restoration

This particular section of the house is in a perilous condition. Structural alterations, the replacement of dilapidated roof coverings ill-suited to the local weather conditions, and a general reorganisation of the layout are all necessary so as better to meet the needs of the visiting public whilst at the same time respecting the history of the house. Restoration work – and even the reconstruction of an entire section of the load-bearing structure – has become essential.

The project

Following an inspection carried out onsite by a chief architect from the French national heritage institution, Monuments historiques, the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs has put together a project outlining the restoration and partial reconstruction of the Generals Wing. The provisional budget required to complete the planned works, which will save and preserve this vitally important heritage site, has been estimated at €1.5 million. The ministry believes that fifty percent of the funding for this project should come from private sources. The task of raising these funds through public donations has thus been entrusted to the Fondation Napoléon. The Souvenir Napoléonien, a French society dedicated to Napoleonic history, has decided to offer its support for this project. To this end, a large number of local committees have been formed to solicit the public for donations.
